Barbadensis Miller

Barbadensis Miller produces two substances used for medicine: The gel is obtained from the cells in the center of the leaf, and the latex is obtained from the cells just beneath the leaf skin. The outer leaf parts include a yellow-green sap (aloe latex) that can have a laxative property. The inner parts of the leaf include, polysaccharide-rich gel that helps to relieve the digestive system and support immune system. Barbadensis Miller is a stimulant to the immune system, a strong, anti-inflammatory, an analgesic and is able to speed up cell growth.

A complex carbohydrate in Barbadensis Miller, acemannan, combines antiviral action, antibacterial properties. It includes polysaccharides and glycoproteins that have antitumor and immune-modulatory properties, Glycoproteins speed the healing process by stopping inflammation and pain, while polysaccharides stimulate skin growth and repair. Beverages made from aloe vera juice possess natural detoxifying properties that effectively cleanse the digestive system and the circulatory system. It improves the blood quality and thus helps in re-balancing the other components in blood like cholesterol and glucose. It effectively lowers cholesterol and total triglyceride content.
